PREFACE.

THE following work began in the author's preparation of notes for use in a course on the Law of Contracts given by him in the College of Law of the Ohio State University. His investigation for that purpose convinced him of the necessity of a work which should be a thorough presentation of the elements of the law of contracts, worked out from American cases, and making full use of the wealth of material contained in the reports of this country — material which is valuable because of the development in detail therein of the underlying principles of contract law, and the excellence of the illustrations of these principles given in the recent American cases; and much of which is available only by independent research. To state the law of contracts as it exists to-day in America is therefore the object of this work. At the same time no statement of that law can be complete if the original Common Law theory of contracts, and the gradual modification of that theory by the English courts is omitted. The general principles of the early Common Law have been gradually transformed in English law, by judicial action, in a constant attempt to re-adjust them to the existing conditions of life; and this modified law has in turn been transplanted to a different country; and under new surroundings and conditions has undergone still further modification and development. It is impossible to understand the present working of a system of law which like ours is the result of long growth without understanding something of its earlier stages. Accordingly the development of the Common Law of contracts has been considered wherever it appeared necessary to an understanding of its present form.

As the subject developed it was found that no complete presentation even of the elements of contract law was possible within the limits originally set. Indeed, brevity of treatment and an elimination of collateral subjects has been found necessary to keep the work within the limits of three volumes.

The general outline of the subject, inherent in its very nature, which was worked out in its most popular and convincing form by Sir William Anson, has been followed in this work. The subject of contracts has been presented under the topics of Formation, Construction, Operation, and Discharge. No change in this outline has been made from desire for novelty of treatment. The nature of American law, the divergence between the views of American and English courts on many important matters, and the limitations existing in this country upon the power of the legislature have made modifications and additions necessary to a logical discussion of this subject from the American standpoint.

The author hopes that this work may be of value to the legal profession, that it may make the lawyer's unremitting toil somewhat lighter, and that it may, even in a slight degree, tend to what should be the ultimate goal of every sincere writer on legal subjects — that is, to place our American jurisprudence on a broad, scientific and national basis.

TABLE OF CASES.

TABLE OF CASES.

For purposes of arrangement names beginning with Mc or M' are separated from those beginning with M. Other prefixes, such as Mac-, La-, and Van, are arranged each under its initial letter. Abbreviations such as Ft. and St. are arranged in the order which they would occupy if spelled in full. Corporate names are arranged with reference to the first distinctive word of each name.

PART I.

INTRODUCTORY.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF THE LAW OF CONTRACT.

§1. Characteristics of primitive law affecting contract.

Primitive law presents two characteristics. It is based entirely upon procedure, and it is intensely formal. Many of the legal ideas which we regard as rational and logical seem unknown in early jurisprudence. At primitive law rights are not based on an orderly and logical system of legal principles. They are limited to those cases where the rigid and formal procedure of the law gives a remedy. Their enforcement depends not on the merits of the case, but on compliance with archaic formalities. Those who administer the law seem incapable of thinking of a right apart from the remedy for enforcing it and the formalities whereby such remedy may be obtained. Abstract ideas, as might be expected, were scarcely known; and while certain classes of rights in corporeal property were recognized and protected, contracts, that is, executory enforceable promises, were practically non-existent.

Contract was recognized at the outset therefore, only in so far as it had created some right to corporeal property. When it began to be recognized as an incorporeal right, it took some symbolical form, often that of a sale. This symbolism sometimes developed into a formal contract; under other circumstances, the form, which was felt to be so essential to the primitive contract, was created in other ways. Not infrequently the form was religious in its origin. In any case, from whatever source the form came, formal promises were recognized and enforced long before any general theory of what we now term contract was worked out.

If the society in which these rules of law have become established is a progressive one, there will sooner or later be a conflict between the needs of the advancing community and the archaic forms of law which have ceased to represent the thought and feeling of the average mass of the community. If a revolution is to be averted there must be some adjustment of law to the facts of life. What happens then depends on the relative force of the contending ideas. On the one hand the forces of repression and conservatism may be strong enough to check all progress until the pressure of advance reaches the breaking point. Then there is a cataclysm of some sort, great or small: a revolution, whether attended with bloodshed or not, since advance is made not by developing the pre-existing law, but by breaking with it. On the other hand the forces that make for progress may at the outset be stronger or better organized; and those that make for conservatism and repression may have better political instinct. In such cases the pre-existing law may be developed by a gradual piece-meal improvement, never losing touch with advance completely and never completely breaking with the old. In such a community law will often be uncertain, but revolutions will be few and far between. It has been the strength of the English-speaking peoples that they have generally chosen the second of these methods of developing their law and their institutions. The uncertainty of the law occasionally thus produced is a mark of the strength and rapid growth of the people; not of the inferiority of the law. If our civilization ever becomes stationary it will not be long before our law will become as fixed and certain as Justinian's code: and as dead.

§2. Evolution of contract at Roman Law.

The Roman Law furnishes, in its development, an interesting illustration of these principles, which may here be briefly noted. The earliest contract known to Roman Law was the nexum, the contract per aes et libram, by means of the money and the scales. The transaction took the form of a symbolic sale, before five witnesses, and the libripens, who held the official scales. A formal dialogue between promisor and promisee took place, during which the scales were struck with the piece of money, probably as a symbol of weighing the copper. The absence of any of these formalities vitiated the contract. A later contract, though a primitive one, was the stipulatio. This was a formal, but not a symbolic, contract. It consisted in formal question and answer; a variance from the prescribed form of which vitiated the contract. These contracts were in one sense narrower than contracts at modern law, since they had to be entered into in strict accordance with form. In another sense they were broader, for such questions as consideration did not exist, and they included all promises, if made in the form required.

Before Roman Law reached its complete development it had evolved a theory of informal contract, and had then gradually dispensed with all requirements of form, finally losing all idea of the peculiarity of the formal contract as distinguished from the informal. In these respects, it furnishes a close parallel to English Law.

§3. Contract in early English Law.

Our knowledge of contract in the pre-Norman, Norman and early Angevin periods of English Law, is slight. We find, as we would expect, that there were means of transferring title to property by transactions which we should to-day class as executed contracts, but it may well be doubted whether these transactions were, at that period, classed as contracts at all.¹ There is, indeed, a strongly marked tendency, running through the whole of our law, to class rights, growing out of a contract executed on one side, as property rights, without reference to the contract in which they originated.²

Of the transactions which we would class as executory contracts, we find little mention in the law of this period. This may be due to any one or more of three causes: first, our knowledge of the law of that period, taken as a whole, is very scanty and meager; and second, we probably know least about the remedies and procedure given by the local courts; and it seems to have been in the local courts that most actions on contract had to be brought.³ Third, the idea, that a right, properly so called, exists only when the state in its official capacity is ready to enforce it in some way, is comparatively recent. In the Norman period there was no incongruity in the idea of a right enforceable only in local courts, or in church tribunals by the sanctions of religion, with which the king's courts would have nothing to do. The church during this period was ready by its ecclesiastical courts and the discipline enforced thereby, to enforce the observation of promises of many kinds. The promises thus enforced undoubtedly included many which our courts of law would not think of enforcing to-day as contracts. But in any event, practical enforcement of some contracts seems to have been left to the ecclesiastical courts, to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the Common Law courts.

² Pollock and Maitland, History of

§4. Jurisdictional importance of writs.

The chief characteristic of the English Common Law in its growth and development was, that rights which we now term substantive were grouped in accordance with the form of action by which a violation of such right might be redressed. The modern theory of law is that, the substantive rights being stated fully and exhaustively, it at once appears whether on the facts of the case there has been any invasion of such substantive right; and that in case there is an invasion, the law gives a remedy by an appropriate proceeding as a matter of course. The Common Law view was exactly opposed to this. A certain number of writs were allowed by the law. Each of these writs could be given in certain specified cases. If the particular case in question did not present such a state of facts as would justify the issuing of one of the known writs, no remedy could be given. This tendency of the Common Law is in part a characteristic which as we have seen ¹ belongs to every system of primitive law. It was further strengthened and intensified by the method in which the Common Law was built up. The reasons for the peculiar force of this idea in English Law are therefore, in part, historical. The Common Law, as we know it, is the law recognized and applied in England by the royal courts. The law generally in force in England in the local or baronial courts in the reign of Henry II. is of great importance since it furnished by far the greater part of the materials from which the royal courts built up their new jurisprudence; but it is as a source of material and not as a rival jurisprudence that it is of marked interest to us.² The permanent establishing of the royal courts by Henry II. is therefore one of the great crises in the development of our law, and marks the nearest approach to a break in the continuity of its development. The reforming influence in mediæval law was likely to proceed from the king. The nobility were satisfied with the existing order of things: the lower classes had no means of expressing their grievances except by occasional rebellions. The middle class was just beginning to exist. Henry II., whatever his personal faults, was a great legal reformer. He found justice in England local or feudal. By establishing royal courts and giving to them jurisdiction over certain classes of cases, he took the first steps which were to make justice in English-speaking countries first royal, and eventually national. In determining what jurisdiction his court should have, Henry II. was probably not controlled by philosophical theories. He seems to have asserted for his court as wide a jurisdiction as he dared. The limits thus set were probably determined by his power rather than by consistent legal theories. In any event the royal court was one of a limited jurisdiction. From the first, it could only hear cases which were brought before it by certain specified forms of writs. The natural tendency of early law to formalism was thus intensified in England by the fact that in the court

² Thus according to the sub-title Glanville purports to treat of "those laws and customs only, according to which pleas are determined in the King's Court, the Exchequer, and before the Justices, wheresoever they may be."

which was really making the Common Law, these forms were jurisdictional in character. The development of the Common Law including the law of contracts is therefore intimately associated with the development of the writs and the various forms of action. These must, therefore, be considered separately.

§5. Debt.

The propositions already laid down may be illustrated by a reference to the earliest work on the Common Law during the Angevin period: that which bears the name of Ranulph de Glanville, Justiciar of England.¹ Glanville, writing toward the end of the reign of Henry II., devotes Book 10 to a discussion "of the debts of the laity, arising from different kinds of contracts, namely: from sale, purchase, gift, loan, borrowing, letting out and hiring; and the pledges and gages, whether movable or immovable; and of charters concerning debts." An examination of this chapter shows that as a rule Glanville is treating of contracts which are executed upon the one side, and the remedy sought by the person who has thus executed the contract is to compel payment. His right is thought of as substantially a right to certain property, whether he is seeking to recover specific property, or to recover payment under the contract. The writ which Glanville gives as the proper one to issue when the plaintiff complains to the King's Court concerning a debt that is due him is as follows: "The King to the Sheriff, Health. Command N. that justly and without delay he render to R. one hundred marks which he owes him, as he says, and of which he complains that he has unjustly deforced him. And, unless he does so, summon him, by good Summoners, that he be before me or my Justices at Westminster in fifteen days from the Pentecost, to shew wherefore he has not done it. And have there the summoners and this writ. Witness, &c."² The debt is looked upon as property of which the defendant is deforced, as we to-day look upon wrongful detention of specific personal convenience, be referred to as "Glanville."

property.³ We find therefore that by the year 1188 A. D. at the latest, the action of debt was thoroughly established. "Pleas concerning the Debts of the Laity also belong to the King's Crown and Dignity."⁴ Even the fact that the debtor had pledged his faith could not shake off the jurisdiction of the King's Court, whatever claims the ecclesiastical courts might make. "Pleas of debt due under pledge of faith or without pledge of faith are to be in the king's justice."⁵ Debt shows its primitive origin in the fact that wager of law is a defence. The commonest form of the wager of law consisted in the defendant's swearing that he did not owe the debt; and a certain number of other witnesses (often twelve) swearing that they believed him. They were practically character witnesses only. Another form of wager of law was defendant's making the oath with certain additional solemnities, often in a certain number of churches. That such defenses were allowed shows that the action of debt is so old that the mode of proof which is characteristic of early Germanic jurisprudence could attach to it and become an inseparable part of it. In later times a forced and artificial attempt to rationalize this method of proof was made. It was said that the plaintiff had voluntarily given credit to the defendant and had thus vouched for his credibility. This late and insufficient explanation was probably not thought of for generations after the wager of law became a defence in the action of debt. Debt lay from the first, as we have seen, for a fixed and liquidated sum of money due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff.⁶ It was an action in one sense much narrower than contract, for it omitted all executory agreements. In another sense it was much wider, for it provided a means of recovering a liquidated sum which might be due for some reason outside of contract: such as a penalty imposed by statute.

The contracts enforceable in the King's Courts, which were most nearly like our executory contracts, were contracts of warranty, for which a remedy was given.⁷ Glanville tells us that a solemn pledge of the faith of the defendant will not be received as any proof in the King's Court, though breach of contract with a violation of faith, may be proceeded for in the Court Christian;⁸ other proof is necessary; and this other proof may be by a proper witness, by the duel, or by a charter.⁹

Apart from this casual reference to sealed instruments as evidence in an action of debt, or in some cases as underlying a warranty, Glanville makes no allusion to the action which was subsequently known as covenant, and based upon an instrument under seal.

The remaining kinds of contracts appear to have been outside of the jurisdiction of the King's Court. Thus Glanville tells us that if there is a contract for a pledge, and the debtor after having received the loan should not give the pledge, the King's Court is not in the habit of giving protection to private agreements of this description made out of court, or even in any other court than that of the King; and therefore, if such compacts are not observed, the King's Court does not interfere.¹⁰ So, after a meager outline of letting and hiring, Glanville tells us that he passes briefly over the foregoing contracts, because the King's Court does not usually take cognizance of them.¹¹ Glanville therefore recognizes an action for a fixed and liquidated debt and for certain breaches of warranty, but not for a mere promise however solemn or for breaches of ordinary contract.

It seems clear, from this chapter of Glanville, that many rights were left to the local courts, or the ecclesiastical courts. If the material for writing a complete history of the English Law of Contract should ever be gathered, it may be found that during the early Angevin period, the King's Court selected certain rights to enforce, leaving others to the ecclesiastical and local courts: as the law administered by the courts of the King came to be looked upon as the Common Law, the law of the other courts dwindled to local custom, and thus passed to oblivion, or was transferred to the realm of religion which we look upon as being outside of law; and that by this means a great mass of rights which once were enforceable in some way, and in some court, became obsolete, and that the subsequent development of the Law of Contract has been in a great measure a gradual winning back by the Common Law, as developed by the King's Courts and the other courts following their precedents, of the ground thus lost.

§6. Covenant.

We consider elsewhere the gradual extension of the use of the seal as a means of authenticating instruments. With the adoption by the lower strata of free men of a form which had once been characteristic of the great men of the realm¹ we find an increasing disposition to recognize the new form of instrument as creating a distinct class of rights. When Glanville wrote the sealed charter was only one kind of evidence, though often the most satisfactory kind, of proving the debt sued for. Soon after Glanville wrote, it appears from the records of the courts that they were beginning to allow a special form of writ for formal written instruments. This is the writ of covenant. Pollock and Maitland² give examples of the writ of covenant of the dates of 1194 A. D. and 1201 A. D. By the time of Bracton the action of covenant is in general use, though he uses language which seems to imply that the courts exercised a rather arbitrary discretion in deciding what contracts they would enforce, and that they were on the whole averse to enforcing contracts made out of court. In speaking of stipulations he refers to the: "Conventional which is drawn up on the agreement of each party, and not by order of the judge or of the prætor, and of which there are as many kinds as there are penalties for contracts, with which the court of the king does not interfere at all except as a matter of grace."³ "Although it is not allowable for any of the parties to recede from covenants it is not usual at any time for a necessity to be imposed on the court of our lord the king to discuss private covenants of this kind. But nevertheless if anyone recedes from a covenant the other party is aided by an action on the covenant, according as will be explained below.”⁴ During the century following Glanville the action of covenant became firmly established as a means of enforcing formal contracts.⁵ For some time the courts seem to have hesitated over the question whether a seal was necessary to a formal contract, or whether a written contract, or even an oral contract made in some solemn form would not be sufficient.⁶ By the reign of Edward I. it was settled that a sealed instrument was necessary to prove a covenant. While this is stating substantive law in terms of evidence, it is only doing what is done in our law to this day. The action of covenant then, became restricted to the sealed contract.

After covenant developed as a separate action, it seems that for several centuries covenant and debt were mutually exclusive; it was not until the seventeenth century that either debt or covenant could be brought where a fixed and liquidated sum of money was owing under a sealed instrument.⁷ Since the Common Law could enforce a contract only by means of a writ, it follows from the foregoing facts that in the twelfth and a greater part of the thirteenth century, the Common Law Courts recognized and enforced only two classes of contracts; those under seal, and those resulting in a fixed and liquidated indebtedness. For the numerous and varied contracts of other classes, no remedy was given, and under our view of what law is, we may say that no such right was recognized by the courts of the king. It must further be observed that debt and covenant were not limited to contracts as we understand them.

Debt especially would lie for many cases which are now outside the pale of contract law, such as statutory penalties, amercements, forfeitures and the like.⁸

§7. The Statute In Consimili Casu.

During the latter part of the twelfth and the early part of the thirteenth centuries the Common Law courts began to arrest the natural development of the Common Law by refusing to allow new writs to be framed for the purpose of meeting new cases as they arose. As we have seen already,¹ this tendency characterizes all legal systems of primitive type. In a nation which is progressing in a social and economic development, an irrepressible conflict ensues between legal theories and the facts of life. A nation thoroughly alive will not remain fettered by a rigid system of law based on an obsolete theory of society. In England relief came from the legislature.² Undoubtedly this legal reform originated with the king, Edward I., and its adoption by Parliament was due to his initiative. The Statute 13 Edw. I., ch. 24, passed in 1284 A. D., is known from the place where Parliament convened as the Statute of Westminster second. From its characteristic words this section of the statute is known as in consimili casu. This section provides that "Whensoever from henceforth it shall fortune in chancery that in one case a writ is found, and in like case falling under like law and requiring like remedy is found none, the clerks of chancery shall agree in making the writ; or the plaintiffs may adjourn it until the next parliament, and let the cases be written in which they cannot agree, and let them refer themselves (them) until the next parliament (and) by consent of men learned in the law a writ shall be made (let a writ be made) lest it might happen after that the court should long time fail to minister justice unto complainants."³ This statute marks a turning point in the history of English Law. If the velopment. Legal fictions and equity worked with legislation to keep the law abreast of national life.

courts had refused to extend their jurisdiction by taking advantage of this statute, equity would have so developed as to overshadow Common Law. If the courts had promptly enforced the statute in the spirit in which it was passed, equity would have had but a limited field for its operations. As it was, the courts compromised. Slowly, and with evident reluctance, they took a partial and limited advantage of this statute; leaving equity room to develop side by side with the Common Law.

§8. Development of assumpsit.

In enlarging their jurisdiction under this statute the Common Law Courts did not approach contract as a separate subject in its nature distinct from other rights; but they treated breaches of contract as wrongs, in principle indistinguishable from non-contract wrongs. To find breach of contract classed as a tort is in some respects startling. It may help us to realize the Common Law standpoint to note that breach of contract is classed under private wrongs or torts by Professor Robinson,¹ in making which classification he follows Blackstone.² The idea that breach of contract is a kind of a tort is, therefore, one which cannot be said to have become obsolete for centuries after the passage of 13 Edw. I. It originated undoubtedly in the period when assumpsit, the last and broadest of the contract actions was developing. The crying need for a new form of action was not at the outset in the domain of contract; but in tort. Under the statute, in consimili casu, the class of cases which first seem to have impressed the courts as being in like case and requiring like remedy with existing forms of action were those in which a wrongful act had been done, which caused damage and yet could not support an action of trespass because the wrongful act did not involve the direct application of force to the person or property injured. Negligence is a typical example of wrongs of this class. To meet such cases, an extension of the writ of trespass known as trespass on the case was devised. This writ was at first allowed in cases which we should class as pure tort. The question which however soon came up for discussion was this. If negligence is actionable and trespass on the case will lie, why should it be the less actionable because the transaction by means of which negligence and resulting damages were possible, originated in the agreement of the parties. To this the courts promptly replied that trespass on the case would lie on such facts. Accordingly where a blacksmith shod a horse and negligently drove a nail into the horse's hoof, thereby laming him, it was held that trespass on the case would lie.³ So if one undertook to carry a horse safely across a river, and overloaded the boat, by reason of which the horse was killed, it was held that trespass on the case would lie.⁴ This form of action was allowed against the specific objection that it should have either been in trespass, or on the agreement. The latter objection, though in form a mere matter of procedure really raised a question of substantive law; for if on contract, the action must have been covenant, since the damages were unliquidated, and no recovery could then be had as the contract was not under seal. Accordingly where suit was brought for undertaking to cure a horse and performing so negligently that the horse died, it was held that the action need not be covenant, but that trespass on the case would lie.⁵ In the cases thus far discussed, the defendant attempted performance but performed in a negligent manner. The question was then further presented whether if the agreement was not under seal this form of trespass on the case would lie against one who had done nothing towards performance. The courts were at first strongly set against allowing this action in such cases. The reason was possibly in part that given by Reeves. "It was thought somewhat harsh to give the name of trespass to a thing which was never done; it took therefore, some time, and needed the concurrent force of some strong motives, to induce the court to admit these new writs."⁶ In the reign of Henry IV. suit was brought against a carpenter for not building or causing to be built certain houses which he had agreed to build. The objection was made that the plaintiff was really counting on a covenant while he failed to show a sealed contract. This objection was sustained by the court, it being suggested in obiter that perhaps it would have been otherwise if it had been averred that the work was begun and by negligence left unfinished.⁷ This decision while outwardly on a question of procedure necessarily involved the idea that an executory contract could not be enforced in case of mere non-performance unless under seal. The same decision was rendered a little later in the same reign.⁸ Apparently contract law had reached its limit of development at the Common Law. It seemed that without aid from the legislature the Common Law would abandon the purely executory contract. The bar did not, however, seem satisfied with this decision as a finality. In the reign of Henry VI.⁹ the attempt to enforce executory contracts by the action of trespass on the case was renewed. An action was brought for breach of a contract to build a mill. It was not alleged that the contract was under seal, or that the defendant had done anything thereunder. The question presented was therefore the same as that presented in the earlier cases. Two out of the three judges, however, held that the action of trespass on the case would lie. The third judge dissented on the ground that if this kind of action would lie in such a case, it would lie on every broken agreement. This was, of course, the real question. Historically the dissenting judge was right. The majority decision was a departure from precedent. It was a departure, however, which settled the law; and it forms the leading case on the elementary proposition that an executory contract, not under seal, is enforceable.

§9. Assumpsit ultimately separated from trespass on the case.

The next step in the development of assumpsit was to differentiate it from the other forms of trespass on the case. This was a slow process. At one time the courts seemed inclined even to take the position that assumpsit was not a contract.¹ After assumpsits were regarded as contracts there was a lingering tendency to treat the action as a special form of trespass on the case. Blackstone refers to "an action on the case for what is called the assumpsit or undertaking of the defendant."² The effect of this tendency was twofold. First, the inclination of the courts to classify assumpsit as a form of trespass on the case led to the anomaly, already noted of classifying breach of contract as a form of tort.³ This very fact, however, made it possible for assumpsit, on ultimately freeing itself from trespass on the case to take shape as a means of enforcing all breaches of enforceable agreements not already provided for by the actions of debt and covenant. After assumpsit became an established and distinct form of action, there was nothing in the technicalities of actions or procedure to prevent the enforcement by the courts of any promises which the law might hold enforceable. Second: the tendency of the courts to treat assumpsit as a form of trespass in the case, and the further fact that it finally took definite shape before rights were grouped on the basis of their inherent nature, led to the result that assumpsit was extended to many classes of cases which we do not class as contract at modern law. The promise in such cases was merely a legal fiction which had to be pleaded but need not be proved. Even some forms of tort might be sued in assumpsit by alleging the fictitious promise. These questions are subsequently discussed in detail.⁴

§10. Contract at Modern Law.

The great change in Modern Law affecting contract has been the abolition of forms of action. In many jurisdictions forms of action have been completely abolished and the civil action substituted therefor. In other jurisdictions, the old forms as was case, while assumpsit has been classed as an action ex contractu.

have been retained, but simplified and with a freedom of amendment that makes the distinction between the different actions of much less importance than under the old system. The effect of this change in procedure has re-acted on the law of contract, as it has on other branches of substantive law. Some classification of law is necessary. The old system of classifying on a basis of procedure is practically obsolete; and we are driven to a more rational and logical but more difficult classification upon the basis of the inherent principles of substantive law. Instead of classing as contract everything for which debt, covenant or assumpsit would lie, we now endeavor to classify rights of action in accordance with their inherent principles. The result is that certain rights of action which have always been classed as contract because enforced by one of the actions ex contractu are now seen to be distinct from contract. If still classed with contract it will be for reasons purely historical.¹ The change in social customs during the past seven centuries has produced a corresponding change in the relative importance of the different branches of substantive law. The law of contract has gained at the expense of most of the other branches. Thus in Glanville's book, about nine per cent of his space is devoted to contract; in Blackstone's, about two per cent; while it is perhaps not too much to say that of Modern Law books, about one-half, outside of the subject of procedure, is devoted to contract. It may be said, therefore, as a summary, that the law of contract has been of late and retarded development. Down to a comparatively recent period in the development of our law there has been no general or comprehensive theory of contract. This has on the one hand prevented the law from becoming fixed with certainty, but on the other hand it has spared us that premature development that results in rigidity and loss of power to meet the needs of progress. From its very insignificance, the law of contract was not elaborated in the early Common Law, as, for example, the law of Real Property was. It was therefore left in a rudimentary state, and for that very reason, far more free to expand on its substantive side into a rational and harmonious system, in sympathy with the scope and spirit of the completed Roman law, than it would have been had its principles been developed in detail at an early stage of growth.

CHAPTER II.

NATURE AND CLASSES OF CONTRACTS.

§11. Theory of contract at Common Law.

From the foregoing historical discussion of the development of the law of contract¹ it can be seen that it is impossible to formulate a statement of the theory of contract which will apply alike to the early Common Law, to the Common Law in its classic form, and to Modern Law. Each of these periods must be considered separately. At Common Law rights were classed as contracts if enforceable by some form of action ex contractu irrespective of their inherent nature. Conversely contracts at Common Law might be defined as those rights which could be enforced by some action ex contractu. In making this statement, however, we are attempting a generalization which was assumed by those who administered the law, but which was rarely stated. We have seen already that the idea of contract at first entertained by the King's Court at first included whatever resulted in a fixed and liquidated indebtedness: and nothing else.² By the reign of Henry III. the idea of contract also took in sealed promises.³ By the reign of Henry VI. the idea of contract had expanded beyond these limits.⁴ The question of the extent of contract depended then upon the growth of assumpsit and the classes of cases in which it would give relief. Passing to the classic period of the Common Law, as summed up for example by Blackstone, we find that contracts were divided into two great classes; the formal, and the informal or the simple contract. Formal contracts were divided into contracts of record and contracts under seal, or specialties.⁵ Contracts of record were divided into judgments, recognizances, statutes merchant, statutes staple, and recognizances in the nature of statutes staple. Simple contracts were divided into express and implied contracts. Express contracts were those in which the agreement was entered into by the parties in so many words. An implied contract was one in which the agreement was not entered into in so many words, but was inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case. As used at Common Law, this included two distinct classes of rights. The first class consisted of those rights which grew out of a genuine agreement between the parties, in which the parties arrived at such agreement by means of conduct, acts, gestures and the like, without expressing their agreement in the form of words. The second class consisted of those rights which did not grow out of any real agreement between the parties, but which the law enforced by the action of assumpsit.

§12. Theory of contract at Modern Law.

No general theory of contract was developed or attempted during the early period of the Common Law. This made it possible to develop such a theory at Modern Law free from the restraint of archaic form and imbued with modern ideas. In this development Roman Law has been freely borrowed; and its general spirit and method have been controlling factors. Occasional confusion necessarily results from imposing Modern Law with its strong tendency toward Roman principles upon a foundation of early Common Law; and from attempting to harmonize the two. It is however useless to ignore this peculiarity of development or to regret it. On the one hand we must acknowledge that our present principles cannot be applied to the early Common Law; and on the other hand, we must also acknowledge that many of the peculiar principles of the early Common Law either are obsolete or are arrested in development and that modern contract law owes part of its ideas to the gradual infusion of Roman Law and part to the original stock of the Common Law.

Contract in its modern sense may be said to involve two distinct ideas. It must originate in agreement;¹ which is to say, contract liability is assumed only by one whose intention, as ascertained in the manner prescribed by law, is to assume such liability. Without such intention, so expressed, no liability in contract exists. Accordingly a liability imposed by statute and not assumed by the voluntary agreement of the parties is not a contract even if it is a liability on which the action of debt could have been maintained at Common Law.² Whether a judgment is to be classed as a contract is subsequently discussed.³ However as within constitutional limits the legislature may provide for the validity, effect and consequences of contracts, it may provide that certain liabilities follow from entering in certain kinds of contracts; and such agreements are contractual in their character. Thus it is generally held that the liability of a stockholder in a corporation to the creditors thereof, imposed by statute and resulting from his ownership of stock is contractual in character.⁴

To amount to a contract this agreement must result in obligation; that is, it must be of such a nature that the law will give some remedy for a breach thereof. Another form of expressing the same idea is to say that a contract is an agreement enforceable at law. A contract at modern law is usually said to consist of four elements: parties competent to contract; a consideration, such as the law will recognize; a subject matter such as the law will allow; and agreement, or meeting of the minds, by offer on the one hand and acceptance on the other.

² "A statute liability wants all the elements of a contract, consideration and mutuality, as well as assent of the party." McCoun v. R. R., 50 N. Y. 176, 180; quoted in Morley v. Ry., 146 U. S. 162.

These elements are considered in detail in the following chapters.⁵

§13. Effect of modern theory on Common Law classification.

The modern theory that contract is an agreement enforceable at law has disarranged Common Law classifications based on the form of action. However, since the Common Law classification went back to the beginning of the Common Law itself, it survives to this day, though the original reason for its existence has long since vanished. The simple contract, though the last to be developed, is now looked upon at Modern Law as the contract par excellence. It is the representative type of contract at Modern Law, and possesses all the elements requisite therefor, since it is an agreement which by reason of its consideration, the law will enforce. Whether the simple contract is express or implied makes no difference except as to the evidence by which it is to be proved, as long as it is a genuine agreement. Contracts under seal are genuine contracts since they are agreements which, by reason of their form, are enforceable at law. They do not possess the same elements as simple contracts; for they require form, which simple contracts do not; and do not require consideration, which simple contracts do; but they are included under the definition of contract. By reason of the abolition of private seals in many jurisdictions, and the requirement of a consideration even in contracts under seal, this class of contracts has lost its original importance. A discussion of the peculiarities of sealed contracts is for this reason reserved until after the elements of simple contracts have been treated.¹

§14. Quasi contract.

If we take the Common Law classification of contracts, and strike out the contracts which are recognized at Common Law as genuine contracts, we have left two classes. These are (1) the contracts of record and (2) the second class of the so-called implied contracts, consisting of rights enforceable at Common Law by the action of assumpsit, and hence classed as contract; but not originating in the voluntary agreement of the parties, and hence excluded from the modern classification of contract. There is a strong tendency at Modern Law to separate these rights entirely from genuine contract and to class them as quasi-contract or as constructive contracts. The historical classification of the Common Law has resisted this tendency to a great extent. Out of deference to the traditional classification, therefore, constructive contracts or quasi-contracts are discussed hereafter, and their present relation to contract is here outlined.¹

§15. Classification and arrangement of topics.

While from an historical standpoint, the contracts creating debt and the formal contracts preceded the ordinary simple contract, it is easier at Modern Law, in discussing the details of the law of contracts, to treat the simple contract as the general type, and to discuss the formal contract as a modification thereof. This plan will accordingly be adopted in this work. The formation of the simple contract as the normal type of genuine contract will first be considered, and the other classes of contract at the Common Law will be treated as variations from this normal type. The forms of written contract will be considered as special types of the simple contract. The subject of parties will be postponed until after a discussion of the Common Law classes of contract, since so much of the law of the contracts of parties of abnormal status involves questions of quasi-contract. The construction, operation and discharge of the contract will then be considered in detail. Finally a group of topics involving the place of contract in American law will be considered. Logically this group might come first; but it will be easier to discuss it after treating of the formation, construction, operation and discharge of contract.

§16. Forms of agreement.

Agreement originates, as will be discussed in detail here-

after¹ in offer and acceptance. Since a contract involves the idea of an outstanding and enforceable promise we must consider briefly the methods in which such an agreement may come into existence. (1) A may make a promise and B may accept it. If A's promise does not require B to do or forbear any right we have here a promise but no contract since no consideration exists.² (2) A may make a promise conditioned on B's making a promise in return. B may make such promise. We have here a contract.³ Each party has an outstanding executory promise enforceable against himself. The only exception to this is the formal contract.⁴ (3) A may make a promise conditioned on B's doing a specified act. B cannot accept this promise in any way other than by doing such act. If he does such act there is no outstanding promise enforceable against B. The only liability existing is against A. This, however, comes within the modern idea of a contract. (4) A may tender an act to be done if B will make a promise. If B accepts by making such promise, there is no outstanding executory liability enforceable against A. The only executory promise is that of B. This, too, comes within the modern idea of a contract. (5) A may tender an act to be performed if B performs an act in return. B cannot accept in any way except by performing such act. If he does so accept, no outstanding executory promise exists against either party. This does not fall within the modern idea of a contract.

§17. Unilateral contracts.

The name "unilateral" has been suggested for contracts executed on one side and executory on the other, or at least for such contracts of this class as are created by performing the act required for acceptance of the offer;¹ that is, for classes 3 and 4, referred to in the preceding section. A distinctive name for a contract of this sort is undoubtedly to be desired; and the term "unilateral" is satisfactory enough as far as derivation is concerned. The objection to it is that it is already used too much, with too many meanings. It is used in equity to denote contracts which cannot be enforced specifically against one of the parties; and, according to some authorities, will not for this reason be enforced specifically against the other.² The term "unilateral" is also used to denote a promise which has not been so accepted by the promisee* as to impose any liability upon him; or which does not by its terms purport to impose any liability upon him.³ It is therefore not a contract at all. An ideal nomenclature does not use the same term for two distinct ideas, and while our legal nomenclature is far from perfect, no innovation should be attempted which confuses established legal terms. The term "bilateral" has been suggested for contracts which are executory on both sides.⁴ The only objection to this term is that it is scarcely used at all outside of academic discussion of the law.

§18. Executed and executory contracts.

From the standpoint of performance contracts have been divided into two classes, the executed and the executory. An executed contract is one in which both parties have fully performed the terms of the contract by them to be performed. An executory contract is one in which the parties have not yet performed the terms of the contract by them to be performed.¹ It is said not to be unilateral, because supported by a valuable consideration.

⁴ Thus the court speaks of a "bilateral executory" contract in Thomas v. Barnes, 156 Mass. 581; 31 N. E. 683.

consists of mutual outstanding promises.² A contract may of course be performed by one party and executory as to the other; or it may be partly performed on one or both sides.

§19. Place of executed contract in law.

An executed contract has transferred title to property, conferred the benefit of services and the like. Whether it can properly be classed as a contract or not is questionable, since a contract is an agreement which results in obligation, an enforceable promise, and in executed contracts there is no outstanding promise to be enforced. It was a contract; but is it still one? Whenever this question has arisen in such form that the courts were called upon to pass on it, inconsistent answers have been given. From the nature of the case, no action can be brought upon it; hence questions as to the form of action, the remedy, and the period of limitations cannot arise. The provision of the Statute of Frauds, that no action shall be maintained on certain kinds of contract, does not of course apply to executed contracts.¹ On the other hand, the constitutional provisions forbidding a state to impair the obligation of contracts apply to executed contracts.² Personal disqualifications which make a contract voidable apply as well to an executed contract as to an executory contract;³ but those which make a contract void have been held not to apply.⁴ Defects in agreements, such as misrepresentation, mistake, fraud, duress and undue influence apply to an executed contract as well as to an executory, and constitute grounds for rescission in proper cases.⁵ Lack of consideration has no effect on the validity of an executed contract, in the absence of mistake, fraud, and the like;⁶ since a gift, on delivery is irrevocable.⁷ Illegality of object has, as a rule, no effect on the validity of an executed contract, except where the legislature has specifically provided the contrary.⁸ The actual decisions are therefore not uniform as to whether an executed contract possesses the elements of a genuine contract. On principle, it may be said that an executed contract should be rather subject to the rules of conveyances than of contracts.

§20. Classes of contract as to validity.

From the standpoint of validity, contracts may be divided into the valid, the voidable and the void. A valid contract is one which either party thereto may enforce, neither party having any right of avoiding liability. In a precise and technical sense there is no such thing as a void contract, since if there is a contract, the transaction cannot properly be termed void; and if the transaction is void, no contract is thereby created. The expression "void contract," is, however, often used to denote that the parties to the transaction have gone through the form of making a contract; but that no contract has been made in law, by reason of a lack of some essential element of a contract.¹ A void contract therefore creates no legal rights of any kind; either party thereto may ignore it at his pleasure as far as it is executory; and third parties may take advantage of its invalidity whenever their interests will be prejudiced otherwise. Usually a void contract being an absolute nullity is held to be
